Bentsen to Leave Treasury Position Early Next Year

By Clay Chandler
THE WASHINGTON POST

WASHINGTON

On Monday, Secretary of the Treasury Robert E. Rubin will announce his resignation from his job as Clinton's chief economic adviser. Rubin, who was appointed to the Treasury post by President Clinton in 1993, will resign effective April 1, 1998.

Rubin's departure will likely come as a surprise to many observers who had expected him to stay in his position for at least another year. Rubin has been a key figure in the administration's economic policy, and his departure is likely to be a major loss for the Clinton administration.

Rubin's resignation is expected to have a significant impact on the Treasury Department and the broader economic policy landscape. His departure will leave a significant gap in the administration's economic team, and it is likely to prompt a search for a new Treasury secretary.

Rubin's resignation is also likely to have implications for the financial markets. His departure is expected to be met with both speculation and uncertainty, and it is likely to prompt a reassessment of the administration's economic policy.

The timing of Rubin's resignation is expected to be announced on Monday, and the administration is expected to announce a new Treasury secretary in the coming weeks. The search for a new Treasury secretary is expected to be a major priority for the administration in the coming months.

Bentsen, who served as Treasury secretary from 1993 to 1996, said in a statement that he will remain in the position until a successor is named. He also said that he will work closely with the new Treasury secretary to ensure a smooth transition.

The departure of Rubin is expected to have a significant impact on the Treasury Department and the broader economic policy landscape. His departure will leave a significant gap in the administration's economic team, and it is likely to prompt a search for a new Treasury secretary.

The timing of Rubin's resignation is expected to be announced on Monday, and the administration is expected to announce a new Treasury secretary in the coming weeks. The search for a new Treasury secretary is expected to be a major priority for the administration in the coming months.

The departure of Rubin is expected to have a significant impact on the Treasury Department and the broader economic policy landscape. His departure will leave a significant gap in the administration's economic team, and it is likely to prompt a search for a new Treasury secretary.

The timing of Rubin's resignation is expected to be announced on Monday, and the administration is expected to announce a new Treasury secretary in the coming weeks. The search for a new Treasury secretary is expected to be a major priority for the administration in the coming months.