The incident only involved a few members of the chapter, but it made the entire chapter wonder if what they had believed was true was also true. The students involved felt betrayed by the administration.

The Theta Beta chapter of Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity was forced to confront the possibility of a wider investigation when its student organization was found to be in violation of MIT's policies.

The chapter's leadership was shocked and appalled by the conclusions of the investigation. They had always believed that the organization had been following all the proper protocols, and they were surprised to learn that there were any incidents that had taken place.

The chapter's response was to immediately begin an internal investigation of their own, in order to determine what had happened and to ensure that it would not happen again.

As the investigation continued, the chapter began to realize that the problem was not unique to them, but was widespread throughout the university. They began to see that the administration was not as responsive to student concerns as they had thought.

The chapter's response was to begin a series of meetings with student leaders from other organizations, in order to work together to address the issues that were affecting the entire university.

The chapter's leadership was determined to use this experience as a catalyst for positive change. They knew that it would take time and effort, but they were confident that they could make a difference.

The chapter's hope was that their experience would serve as a wake-up call for the administration, and that it would lead to greater accountability and transparency going forward.

The chapter's leadership was committed to using this experience as an opportunity to effect positive change, and they were determined to work with other student leaders to achieve their goals.
