COMMUNICATION.

The Editors do not hold themselves responsible for opinions expressed by correspondents.

Since Technique has just appeared this seems a propitious time to me for calling your attention, and possibly through your columns the attention of your readers, to one defect of the present system of editing this worthy publication. Every year a new board comes in without any previous experience, except such as may be gathered from work on the Institute's periodicals or on some school annual. This board has to build up an efficient organization and to get out a book equal to, if not better than, those of former years. Is it not possible to substitute for these annual spasmodic productions of each new class some continuous and connected form of organization which will enable each new board to profit more fully by the successes and to avoid more effectually the faults of former classes? This could be done without allowing the book to lose its individuality as a publication of the Junior class by having one or more Sophomores as roustabouts for each successive Board. These men would have no vote on the board and their duties would consist simply of helping the editors to the end that in the following year they would be in a position to advise and to govern the efforts of their own class when it came to undertake this work. These suggestions are somewhat tentative, but the matter truly requires some consideration from all concerned.

The grand event of Junior Week at Boston University last week was the Junior Prom held on Friday evening. There were two hundred and fifty couples present, many of the guests being from other institutions, as Harvard, Tufts, Wellesley, Radcliffe, Smith and Tech.
