That the professional societies at the Institute are beneficial to their members needs no expounding; not only do they tend to Professional create closer friendships, Societies. but by the lectures given before them, they also make valuable additions to the regular courses of instruction. One of these, the Architectural Society, offers a greater advantage in one feature in which the other societies are weak. It requires that every new member upon initiation make a tracing of some one of the valuable standard designs in the architectural library. In this way a collection of valuable drawings has been accumulated, of which any member may have blue-prints made, thus obtaining at a low cost an exceptionally good set of references for use in his work after graduation. It would be impossible to carry out this plan in all of the societies, but plans of a similar nature would, besides saving time and trouble, prove instructive as well as beneficial and would make the membership in the societies something more than an empty honor.
