SHIP CONSTRUCTION

curacy of the student's work in fairing and laying out the lifts.

Mould Loft.

An optional course in mould loft is offered to students at the end of the third year, covering the first ten days of the summer vacation. For this purpose the drawing room is cleaned of desks and a large floor space is available.

Before the frames of a ship can be bent it is necessary to have a drawing of the complete body plan to full size, which, of course, has to be made directly on the floor of the mould loft. To get this body plan the lines have to be carefully faired to full size on the floor or to a scale of say one inch to the foot on a glass or marble top table. Paper is not good for this purpose as the shrinkage of it may cause serious errors. It formerly was the custom in all ship yards to fair the lines full size on the mould loft floor, but now many of them both here and abroad prefer the glass-topped table, and that is the method used at the Institute. After the fairing is thus done the full-sized body plan can readily be constructed. Plating edges, stringers, floors, double bottoms, ribbands, etc., are all laid off as would be done in the ship yard enough templates are laid out to show the methods usually employed.

This work is strictly of a practical nature and gives the student an exceptional opportunity to acquaint himself with one of the vital processes in shipbuilding. It would take a man several months in a yard to pick up the points that he can here gain in ten days.
